Measurements from Planck have extracted almost all the information about the statistical properties of the primordial seeds for structure available in the CMB. Additional improvements will have to come from precision measurements of the large scale structure at later times in the history of the Universe. I will discuss some of the challenges that this presents and some recent theoretical developments related to the modeling of non-linearities in structure formation.