Upcoming cosmic surveys DESI and LSST will teach us about the physics driving cosmic acceleration, both now and in the past, and about neutrinos and other particles hidden in the dark sector. Even after these planned surveys end, there will be an enormous amount of information left to mine in the sky. I present several half-baked ideas for how to extract this information, trying to illustrate the theoretical challenges that await us.